Investment Advisor's Assessment

Market

The first half of May saw significant volatility on most world markets, including those in Russia and the CIS, with stronger upside than downside movement. The second half of May saw a spectacular jump in the indices, with a lesser increase in most funds. The increase was mainly due to Prime Minister Putin's announcement of more favorable tax treatment for oil and gas companies to encourage production, which, given the high percentage of the indices based on oil and gas, explains both the major increase in the indices and why general fund performance did not match it.

After searching for a direction, oil and commodity prices once more increased, with oil setting record prices day after day. Certain other commodities, in particular foodstuffs, have followed suit. The markets relevant to Tera continue to look solid, although after the good move in May, it looks as if we might take a breather at this level before moving higher.

Fund

The Fund was up nicely in May, with one underlying fund up over 13%. (That fund, mostly hydrocarbon focuses, had been lagging until recently.) All of our other funds were also up, but not as significantly. Tera's statistics are now starting to show its real strength in absolute terms, as its trailing 12-month growth is now back over 20%. We fully expect this number to continue to increase as the Fund builds on its relatively small, but comparatively excellent, growth in the first quarter.

June First Look

The Russian and CIS markets fell in the first part of June, but a recovery may be in the offing. As a whole, the month looks as if it may be slightly down or essentially unchanged. However, we expect Q2 to be the 12th positive quarter out of 13 since Fund formation.
