Investment Advisor's Assessment

Market

A superficial analysis of November would lead one to conclude that it was just another down month in a continuation of the trend since June of this year. A more detailed analysis shows something quite different. The trend during each of the previous five months was steadily down and each month set new lows. As part of this trend, in late October, the Russian market hit a five year low. It bounced back sharply immediately afterwards, which happened to be at the end of that month. While the markets fell back shortly afterwards and tested the October low on one occasion in November, they never fell below it. Thus, while November was down from the end of October, it was actually up almost 20% from the October low – the first time such a trend reversal occurred during this very severe correction. Thus, there is a very good argument that the Russian market bottomed in late October and began stabilizing at just above that level during November. However, most markets experienced record volatility in November, which made any sort of hard conclusions difficult.

Fund

As has been the rule during this crisis, the Fund exceeded both of its benchmarks, i.e., all Russian indices (each of which fell more than 14%) and most Russian funds. The outperformance margin has begun to increase a bit to more typical levels as the market began to settle down and sectors began to distinguish themselves once again. Even taking the crisis into consideration, since inception, the Fund still has grown at an annual rate of over 5%, while all three Russian indices and almost half of Russian funds are now showing negative growth over the same period.

December First Look

December has thus far moved essentially sideways. Volatility has been much lower than in November but the markets have still not reached the 800 level set in late October and early November. The biggest concern would appear to be oil prices, which have broken through $40 a barrel and have yet to find a new support level, notwithstanding OPEC's announced 2.2 million barrel reduction.
