Investment Advisor's Assessment

Market

Contrary to the persistent rumors in Russia and elsewhere regarding an imminent "second wave" of the economic crisis, September was a banner month on the Russian markets – even more so than on other markets throughout the world. Foreign money was starting to come back into the market on a fundamental basis, which was clear due to the fact that oil remained virtually unchanged throughout the month at around $70 a barrel. This is a very positive development for Russian equity markets as any increase in oil prices will drive Russian equities higher. Market volumes increased significantly from the prior month as more investors are returning. This, of course, also bodes well for long equity investors such as Tera.

Fund

Other than continuing to perform well, the most important development for Tera was that cash held by underlying funds fell by almost 40%, to 19% of the Fund's assets. An interesting corollary to that development is that approximately 25% of that cash is held in gold, which has very recently experienced a record rise in nominal terms – and which shows every sign of continuing as inflation threatens globally.

October First Look

The first two days of October were very negative, although the Fund was still up. The first full week of October, markets recovered, and Tera rose further. As of October 9, we calculate that Tera is up over 6%. Of course, a lot of October remains, but the early signs are very good.
