Investment Advisor's Assessment

Market

March saw a global equity market recovery, with Russia the best performing market in the world. All three major Russian indices were up significantly and every fund but one in the AAM Russia fund index was also up. Oil prices and the ruble stabilized (no coincidence) and the Russian equity market was apparently "re-rated", raising its overall P/E ratio from 2.5 to 4. (The P/E ratios in the other three BRIC countries are all still more than twice as high.) Virtually all sectors benefited from the upturn, but none as much the two that were hardest hit prior to the crisis: financials and oil & gas.

Fund

The Fund underperformed both of its benchmarks, notwithstanding the fact that one underlying fund was up just over 30% in March. This was due to the fact that management of Tera's largest fund holds mostly cash (over 80%, down slightly from February). This fund's management believes the crisis is not over and that we will see a "second wave" before the end of this year. We remain in frequent contact with this fund and still feel it is still too early to reach any judgment.

The advantage of this balanced approach is that Tera is positioned to benefit from any continued upside movement while simultaneously being protected against any downside movement. While this approach reduces volatility, it does result in Tera underperforming its benchmarks in the short term.

April First Look

April initially continued the growth of March; thereafter the markets were essentially flat, with the RTS remaining solidly above 800 and volatility very low. Oil prices and the ruble continued almost unchanged. The month should be positive.
