Investment Advisor's Assessment

Market

February saw the downturn on markets generally continue, but was clearly an inflexion point for Russia. The RTS finished the month up slightly. The other two major Russian indices that make up Tera's benchmark, the MSCI Russia index and the ROS, were both down very slightly, leaving Tera's benchmark average essentially unchanged – the first time that has happened since May 2008. The ruble began a slow but steady recovery, up over 2% for the month, which also stabilized markets in Russia. Volatility was down significantly in February, accelerating the trend we saw in the prior two months.

Fund

The Fund was outperformed by both of its benchmarks, the first time that has happened in almost a year. The reason is clear: while two underlying funds were up over 10%, Tera's largest position was actually down slightly – and in February had over 85% of its assets under management (AUM) in cash. This fund's management believes that the crisis is not actually over and that a "second wave" that could be more severe than the first is around the corner. We are in frequent contact with the management of this fund regarding its intentions but feel it is still too early to conclude whether management is correct. One thing is certain, however, Tera is positioned to do well regardless of who is correct, although the very safety of its position will lower returns slightly in the short term.

March First Look

March accelerated the trends begun in February. The Russian markets should end the month in positive territory. It is clear too early to determine whether this is a trend or a one-off event.
